Questions 153-156 refer to the following article.

Airport Shuttle Improve Navigation

SHEFFIELD (12 April)-Airline passengers must often cover long distances to get from one area of the airport to another. Doing so in a timely fashion can be challenging. To help passengers, some airports have begun offering partially autonomous vehicles (shuttles) to transport people inside the airport. As the learn, "partially autonomous" suggests, these vehicles do not require a human driver in the vehicle. They look like smaller, open-top version of trains. They travel at about 10 kilometres per hour, and each carries up to fifteen passengers.

Windwest Ltd., the well-known sports car company based near Sheffield, England, has designed and manufactured shuttles used at several major airports around the world. Nelson Eggert, an engineer with Windwest Ltd., said that engineers adapted existing automobile safety features to create systems that allow trained airport personnel to operate the shuttles remotely.

In each airport, the shuttles are guided digitally along programmed pathways by computers and employees who ensure that they operate safely and efficiently. "Just as air traffic controllers keep watch over the airplanes, members of the Shuttle Overnight Team monitor the vehicles," explained Manfred Huber, who supervises the team at Wolkenshef Airport outside of Frankfrut, Germany, "I believe the use of these shuttle systems in large airport will continue to grow."

153. What aspect of shuttle vehicles is NOT discussed?
(A) Their speed
(B) Their cost
(C) Their appearance
(D) Their capacity

154. What is indicated about Windwest Ltd. engineers?
(A) They applied their knowledge of vehicle safety features in a new way.
(B) They worked with employees from another company.
(C) They redesigned the Sheffield Airport.
(D) They stopped working on sports cars.

155. The word "monitor" in paragraph 3, line 7, is closest in meaning to
(A) remind
(B) check on
(C) perform with
(D) test

156. Who most likely is Mr. Huber?
(A) A customer service agent
(B) A shuttle vehicle designer
(C) An aircraft mechanic
(D) An airport employee
